primary nursing care unit, or a traditional referral model through a social worker? What is the cost/benefit ratio associated with each of these models?

We endorse Palmer's belief that "any health care research which is not ultimately measured by the quality of life of the patient, is misdirected"[9]. Although the means of measuring quality are notoriously complex and elusive at the level of the individual patient, the organizational behavior literature includes models that facilitate the comparative analysis of organizational variables. Further study of such structural and functional variables is needed to provide sound bases for administrative decision making in nursing as well as hospital management.
